LOBSTERS BEING EXTERMINATED BY RAVENOUS FISH

George Nidevar Brings From Story From Islands of Havoc Wrought

Crawfish are disappearing from the waters about the channel islands, and according to the observations of George Nidever the "sheephead" a species of fish, is the cause. This ravenous fish is said to be making rapid inroads upon both crawfish and lobsters.

Mr. Nidever has a crawfish camp on the ocean side of Santa Cruz island. He has just come to the mainland to visit relatives and prepare for other activities. He says the past season has been a hard one for lobster fishers. He has gone to many fathoms with his traps in an effort to keep up with the market demands for crawfish.

In many of his traps he has found fat sheephead fast prisoners. They hooked their heads into traps after the lobster bait, and many, not being able to escape, were hauled to the surface. "They are eating tons and tons of the young lobsters," said Mr. Nidever, "and within a few years there will not be a lobster remaining."

Mr. Nidever is a son of Captain Nidever, who attained historical fame in these parts by rescuing from the islands the last remaining member of a tribe of Indians which once lived there. An Indian woman had been left behind by accident when the Indians were brought to the mainland, and years later Captain Nidever discovered her tracks in the beach sands, and led an expedition to rescue her.
