

Health and Beauty Needs

Jergens Lotion. 2.94 ea. Fedco price
Choose 20-oz. -2.00 ea. Mr. rebate* bonus size .94 ea. Final Cost
Advanced Therapy
or 13-oz. bonus size EverSoft Dry Skin lotion.
*Details in store.

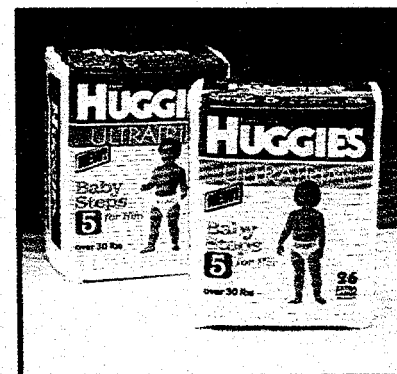

Softsoap Liquid Refill. 4.94
Choose gentle, pure and mild
Original. 1 gallon.
AntiBacterial Moisturizing
Formula. 1 gallon. 6.89

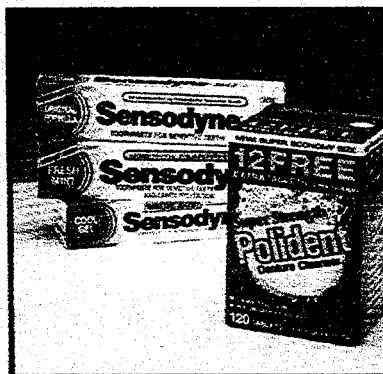

Jhirmack Hair Spray. 2.57
8.4 oz.
Jhirmack Shampoo or Conditioner.
13.2 oz. ea 3.09
Playtex Tampons. Deodorant or non-deodorant. 22 ct. ea 3.49

Johnson & Johnson
Band-Aid® Brand Bandages. 1.39
60 ct.
Coach® Sports Tape. 1½" x 10 yds. 1.77
Coach® Elastic Bandages. 2" x 4 yds. 1.97
3" x 4 yds. 2.37

New! Ultratrim Huggies. 8.97
Baby Steps for him or her.
Available in assorted sizes, Steps 1 thru 5.

Sensodyne Toothpaste. 4.29
The toothpaste for sensitive teeth. Assorted formulas. 6 oz.
Polident. Super-strength denture cleanser.
120 tablet bonus size. 4.77

The Lone Woman of San Nicholas Island

by WOODY McBRIDE

Seventy-five miles off the Southern California coast, the small island of San Nicholas served as a bombing range for the U.S. Navy in World War II. Later, the Navy targeted the island while testing its secret guided missile. Today the rocky isle is home to sea lions, seals, walrus and several species of birds.

It was far different in 1602, when Spanish explorer Sebastian Vizcaino discovered San Nicholas, then populated by a large tribe of Native Americans who lived there in contentment and isolation from the mainland. But by the early 19th century, the island was rediscovered by hunters who decimated the seal and otter population and much of the Indian population as well. In 1835, friars at the San Gabriel Mission decided the San Nicholas Indians would be better off living on the mainland, and dispatched Captain Charles Hubbard to round them up and return them to Los Angeles.

As the islanders were boarding the captain's boat, one young woman cried out that her baby had been left behind, and jumped overboard. The captain decided chasing after her was too much trouble and ordered the vessel to sail.

Fifteen years later, two hunters, Thomas Detman and George Nidever, trekked to San Nicholas to shoot seal and otter. The hunters' Indian guide mentioned he'd seen a naked woman running in the hills, a tale they chalked up to a case of "squaw fever." But in 1853, when Nidever and Detman again returned to San Nicholas, they discovered small, human footprints in the sand, and went in search of the mystery woman. For three weeks she eluded them until, by accident, the hunters finally found her. Her camp was so well hidden, Nidever and Detman would have passed it had her dog not growled. When she finally emerged from her hideout, she made quite an impression: She was splendidly clothed in a dress of shimmering green cormorant feathers.

The next day Nidever and Detman led her onto their boat and sailed for Santa Barbara. While at the mission it was discovered that Native Americans, including second-generation members of her tribe, could not converse with her, so unusual was her dialect. As a result, the fate of the baby she jumped ship to save remained a mystery. Within a month the woman, in perfect health when found, was too weak to walk. She had lived for 18 years on raw abalone and fish and could not tolerate the rich mission food. Within three months she was dead.

Before she died, the woman was baptized and named Juana Maria. Her green feather dress, replaced with "sensible attire," was sent to the Pope where it remains in the Vatican Museum. In 1928, the Daughters of the American Revolution installed a plaque on her grave at the Santa Barbara Mission, where it can be seen today.

Woody McBride is a Fedco staff writer.

Sale prices
in effect

October 7-20

The Lone Woman of San Nicholas Island

by WOODY McBRIDE

Seventy-five miles off the Southern California coast, the small island of San Nicholas served as a bombing range for the U.S. Navy in World War II. Later, the Navy targeted the island while testing its secret guided missile. Today the rocky isle is home to sea lions, seals, walrus and several species of birds.

It was far different in 1602, when Spanish explorer Sebastian Vizcaino discovered San Nicholas, then populated by a large tribe of Native Americans who lived there in contentment and isolation from the mainland. But by the early 19th century, the island was rediscovered by hunters who decimated the seal and otter population and much of the Indian population as well. In 1835, friars at the San Gabriel Mission decided the San Nicholas Indians would be better off living on the mainland, and dispatched Captain Charles Hubbard to round them up and return them to Los Angeles.

As the islanders were boarding the captain's boat, one young woman cried out that her baby had been left behind, and jumped overboard. The captain decided chasing after her was too much trouble and ordered the vessel to sail.

Fifteen years later, two hunters, Thomas Detman and George Nidever, trekked to San Nicholas to shoot seal and otter. The hunters' Indian guide mentioned he'd seen a naked woman running in the hills, a tale they Nicholas to shoot seal and otter. The hunters' Indian guide mentioned he'd seen a naked woman running in the hills, a tale they chalked up to a case of "squaw fever." But in 1853, when Nidever and Detman again returned to San Nicholas, they discovered small, human footprints in the sand, and went in search of the mystery woman. For three weeks she eluded them until, by accident, the hunters finally found her. Her camp was so well hidden, Nidever and Detman would have passed it had her dog not growled. When she finally emerged from her hideout, she made quite an impression: She was splendidly clothed in a dress of shimmering green cormorant feathers.

The next day Nidever and Detman led her onto their boat and sailed for Santa Barbara. While at the mission it was discovered that Native Americans, including second-generation members of her tribe, could not converse with her, so unusual was her dialect. As a result, the fate of the baby she jumped ship to save remained a mystery. Within a month the woman, in perfect health when found, was too weak to walk. She had lived for 18 years on raw abalone and fish and could not tolerate the rich mission food. Within three months she was dead.

Before she died, the woman was baptized and named Juana Maria. Her green feather dress, replaced with "sensible attire," was sent to the Pope where it remains in the Vatican Museum. In 1928, the Daughters of the American Revolution installed a plaque on her grave at the Santa Barbara Mission, where it can be seen today.

Woody McBride is a Fedco staff writer.