A Spanish Outpost.

Off the coast of Alta California, about two degrees distant, bearing nearly West from Point San Pedro, which is in the latitude of 23 45 N. and longitude 119 14 W., will be found a small island, called by the Spaniards Santa Nicholas. This island was formerly inhabited by an inoffensive, indolent race of Indians, who subsisted almost entirely upon fish which they caught from the rocks, and seashells which they found in the sands of the beach. They were a shy, quiet race of beings, who seldom had communication with others of the human family, and who had but few wants and fewer cares.

About the year 1813 or '14, the Russians, from their settlements at the North, landed on this island a party of Kallias Indians, for the purpose of hunting the sea Otter which at that period abounded in those waters. This party remained on the island for more than two years; and were the means of sowing the seeds of disease and contention among the unwarlike and unsophisticated inhabitants.

Some ten or twelve years after the departure of the Kallias, this tribe had become diminished to about twenty or thirty individuals, when the Governor of the department of California sent over a small vessel and removed them to the main.

In the last boat which was embarking with the least of this people, joined six or eight perhaps in number) to convey them to the vessel, which was to carry them from the home of their nativity forever, was one of the tribe, small in stature, not far advanced in years, and his dusky mate, then in the bloom of life. The order had been given to shove from the shore; the oars had dipped in the wave; the boat was rising on the foaming surf, then breaking on the beach with awful roar, when with the impulse of the moment as it were, this young and blossoming bride of the red man, the imprint of whose footstep had been the last left on the sands of her island home, waved an adieu to her chosen mate, plunged into the abyss, "strove through the surge," and, in another moment, stood alone on the shores of her native land. She turned, to give the last lingering look to her departing help-mate; and then, gathering round her form her flowing mantle, wet by the ocean wave, in an instant disappeared forever from the sight of her astonished and sorrowing companions.

The vessel weighed anchor, spread her canvas; and, in forty-eight hours, this remnant of the inhabitants of San Nicholas were landed on Point San Pedro, homeless and forlorn.

From that period to the present—if she be not dead, or has not left within the past eighteen months—has resided alone, on the Isle of San Nicholas, this female Crusoe, the monarch of all she land, the female Criscoe, the monarch of all her surveys. She preferred to part even with her chosen mate, and sever every human tie that could be binding, rather than leave the home of her birth—that lonely little isle, that had been to her a world, which she cared not to exchange for the abode of civilized man, with all its promised luxuries.

Since our Criscoe became the sole monarch of the isle, San Nicholas has been visited perhaps ten or twelve different times, by different individuals; but there she has continued to be found, with none to dispute her right—alone, solitary and forsaken.

Her dress, or covering, is composed of the skins of small birds, which she kills with stones, and sews them together with a needle of bone and the light sinews of the hair seal, sometimes found dead among the rocks. Her only food is a shell fish, of the muscle species, with now and then a still smaller fish, which the surf sometimes throws on the beach. She never remains long in one spot; but is constantly wandering around the shores of the island, sleeping, which she seldom does, in small caves and crevices in the rock.

During the few last years, it has been very difficult to obtain communication with her. As the approach of the white man she flees, as from an evil spirit; and the only way to detain her is by running her down, as you would the wild goat of the mountains, or the young fawn of the plains.

Those who have seen her at the latest period, report that she appears to have lost all knowledge of language; that she makes only a wild noise, altogether unknown; and when taken and detained against her will, becomes frightened and restless; that the moment she is liberated, she darts off, and endeavors to secrete herself in the wild grass, or among the rocks which hang over the never ceasing surf.

Every endeavor has been made, and every inducement offered, by different individuals, to prevail upon her to leave the island, but in vain. The only home she appears to desire is her own little isle. Her last hope, if she has any, is to finish her journey alone. She has no wish, now, to hear again the sweet music of speech. Its sounds are no longer music to her ear; and as for civilized man, his language is shocking even to her dormant senses.

To all appearances, she is strong, healthy, and destined to be alone. What can reconcile her to her lot, who can conjecture? Humanity may hope that contentment may continue to be hers to the last hour; for she is destined to lie down and die alone, on the cold shore of her isolated home, with no one to administer to her last wants, and none to cover her cold body, when the spirit shall have left the clay.

But the story of our Crusoe's chosen mate, the companion of her early life, has yet to be told. He saw her for the last time, as we have stated, when

NEW YORK, SAT. MOR. JAN. 11. 1879. IN THE LATE AFTERNOON, when she stood alone on the shores of her own lake; when the boat with himself and his companions was dashing through the wild surf, that broke in uninterrupted succession against the rocks which encircled the resting place of his fathers, and which he was then leaving for ever. With the remainder of the family from San Nicholas, our hero was landed at San Pedro, and there left, with the others who had accompanied him, to find a home in that land of strangers.

San Pedro, it may be known, is a bleak, barren, bluff point, running out into the blue waters of the Pacific, on which no verdure is to be seen, and but one solitary shrub of man, rising amid the desolation which surrounds it. The Pueblo de los Angeles is situated ten leagues distant, with one farm house between the one on the point and those of the town. The mission of San Gabriel lies yet farther on, some three or four leagues where, at that time, might be found, perhaps three or four hundred converted Indians.

But our hero, as he may be called, never left the beach on which he was first landed. Alone and friendless, there he remained, an isolated being, till life ceased to animate his frame. True it is, that several times he was induced, and once or twice forced, to venture as far as the pueblo, and even the mission of San Gabriel; but he always, as soon as at liberty, returned and resumed his old station on the beach—the Royal himself on the rocks which have solitary, reclining and reclused in the bosom of the beach, or fixed himself on the rocks which hung around the Point. And there he might always be seen, a solitary outcast, as it were, and more constantly when the sun was going down, with his eyes gazing on that celestial orb as it sunk into the western horizon, a direction which he well knew pointed to the lost but never forgotten home of his nativity.

With difficulty he sustained the wants of nature by fishing about the rocks, gathering mussels, and sometimes receiving a scanty pittance of corn from the house on the Point, or a few pence from a passing stranger.

He studiously avoided, as far as possible, all intercourse with his fellow men, and sought to live and die in solitude; and so did he continue to live a life which manifestly appeared a burden to him, till one morning, as the sun rose, not two years past, his body was found upon the beach a stiffened corpse, crushed out, and bleaching, as it were, in the white foam of the surf, which was thrown about his lifeless remains as the mighty wave broke on the shore.

It is presumed his death was accidental—that while searching for shell fish, in the night, among the rocks, he must have fallen from an eminence, and thus terminated his solitary existence.
